How to be a successful college student!

High School vs. College Courses

- PACE: One of the fundamental differences between high school and college level courses is that students learn content outside of class. This means your instructor is responsible for giving you the resources you need to learn once class has ended. Your instructor is not responsible for presenting every single kind of example that exists. Courses may require 2-3 hours per credit per week of work outside the classroom.
- ATTENDANCE: In high school an instructor may spend multiple days covering one section. In college, an instructor may only spend one day on the material. If you miss a class, you are responsible for learning the material you missed; even if the absence was excused.
- KNOW RESOURCES: Because of these differences, it is important for you to know your resources. The most effective resource is usually the other students in the class. Organizing study groups can help offset some of the challenges you will face.

• Your high school will provide a Course Information sheet

- Guaranteed Transfer (GT) – means the course will transfer to any public Colorado college or university. For private or out-of-state colleges, you'll need to contact the receiving school.
- Non Guaranteed Transfer classes are usually career and technical education (CTE) classes like Culinary, Interior Design and Welding. These classes can typically be applied to a AAS degree or certificate programs.

College Now Programs at Front Range Community College/Larimer Campus

Front Range Community College's College Now program allows students to earn both high school and college credit for the same FRCC class. In High School Select, students take FRCC classes that are conveniently offered at the high school.

All curriculum and expectations are the same as in a college class—the only difference is the location. Students should expect that High School Select classes will be more challenging with a heavier workload than most typical high school classes.

In addition to the High School Select program, the College Now department also offers opportunities for high school students to take classes on campus. For a description of our programs, please visit www.frontrange.edu/lc-collegenow.
